Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for coronary artery disease between men who had been exposed to asbestos and those who had not. A case-control study was conducted among men aged 60 years or older who resided in the same community as the subjects of the first National Health and Medical Research Council Australian Cancer Incidence Study. Cases were defined as men with a confirmed diagnosis of myocardial infarction or angina pectoris. Controls were randomly selected from the electoral roll. Information on potential risk factors was obtained by telephone interview. The results showed that the prevalence of smoking, hypertension, diabetes mellitus, hypercholesterolemia, and family history of coronary artery disease was similar in both groups. However, the prevalence of exposure to asbestos was significantly higher in cases than in controls ($P = .007$). These findings suggest that exposure to asbestos may be a risk factor for coronary artery disease.
